OOOOOO! WHAT A GROUCH! WOO-WOO!

"Come, Papacito!" cried Little Pancho Vanilla early one morning as he prodded the figure huddled beneath a pile of pillows and blankets. "Rise and shine!"

"Oh, no!" groaned Papacito, warily opening one eye to peer at his wide-awake son. "Eet cannot be morning so soon."

"Of course," laughed Little Pancho, pointing to the clock-radio on the bedside table. "Just leesten to your radio! The Sunrise Amigo is already on the air!"

"Sunrise Amigo, indeed!" snorted Papacito, glaring at the radio. "He ees no amigo of mine. Seex o'clock in the morning ees no time for anyone to get up!"

"But, Papacito, it's a beautiful morning," countered Little Pancho, "and besides, you must go to work!"

"I know, I know," muttered Papacito, yawning a mighty yawn. "But someday I am going to tell that Sunrise Amigo just what I theenk of him. Een fact," he added, looking cheerful for the first time that morning, "I will do eet right now!"

"But, Papacito," objected Pancho with a worried frown, "Senor Reech Ranchero . . ."

"Senor Reech Ranchero and hees bools can wait a while thees morning!" proclaimed Papacito with a wave of his hand. "Get a pencil and paper, and I weel dictate a letter while I eat breakfast!"

Once at the breakfast table, Papacito cleared his throat and began:

"Senor Sunrise Amigo: For many months, I have been an unweeling member of your audience at seex (ugh!) o'clock een the morning. I do not theenk you are an amigo of the sunrise — no! You make the sunrise even worse than eet ees already. . . ."

"Papacito!" protested Little Pancho.

But all in vain. Papacito continued with his tirade, becoming more and more eloquent as he warmed to his subject.

"And be sure to send that letter off this very morning!" trumpeted Papacito as he brought his dictation to a close. "After my letter, the Sunrise Amigo weel never shine again!"

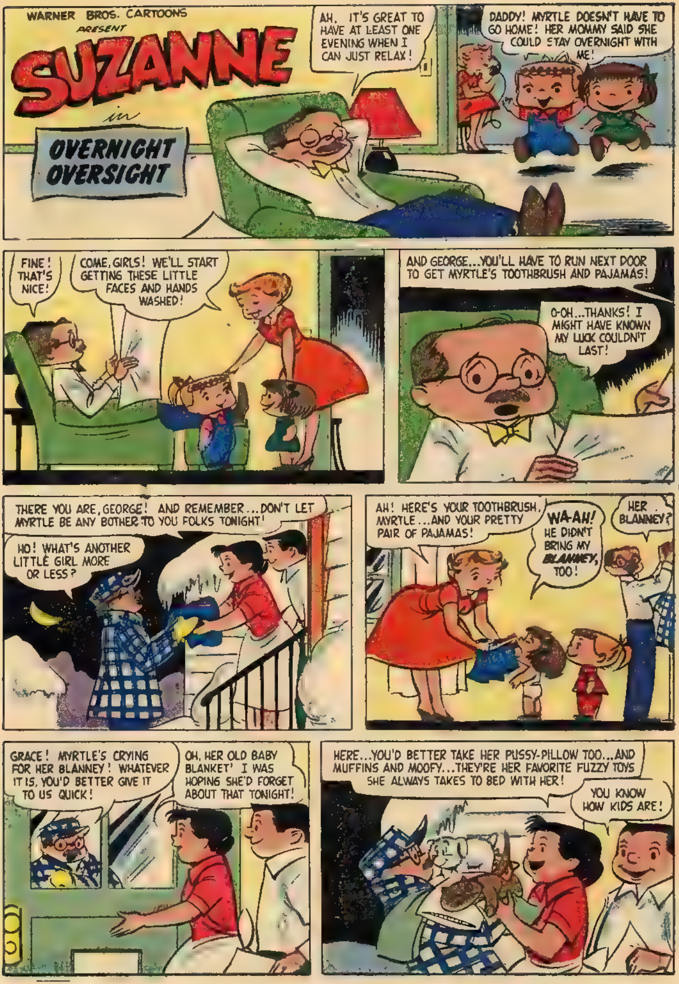

On the evening of the very next day, as Little Pancho and his parents sat before the fire, there was a knock at the door.

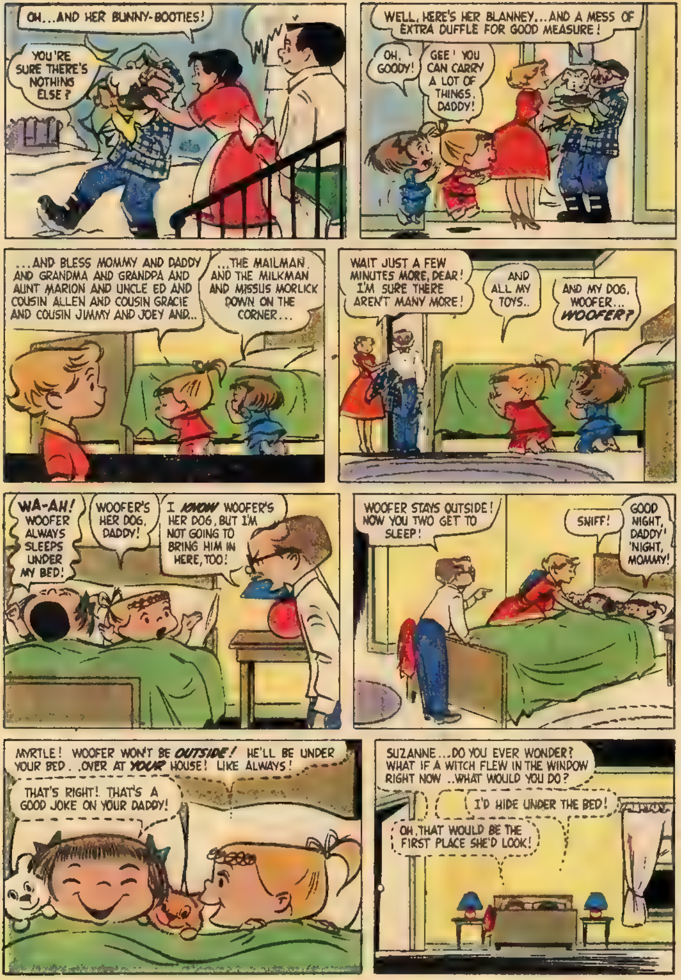

"Where is Papacito?" boomed the man at the door, while the little family stared in speechless amazement. "I am the Sunrise Amigo," he explained as he looked about. Then, seeing Papacito, who was cowering in his chair, his courage rapidly fading away, the Sunrise Amigo hurried across the room. "Such style! Such expression!" he cried. "You have described just how everyone feels at six o'clock in the morning. The Sunrise Amigo is no more! I have resigned my position!"

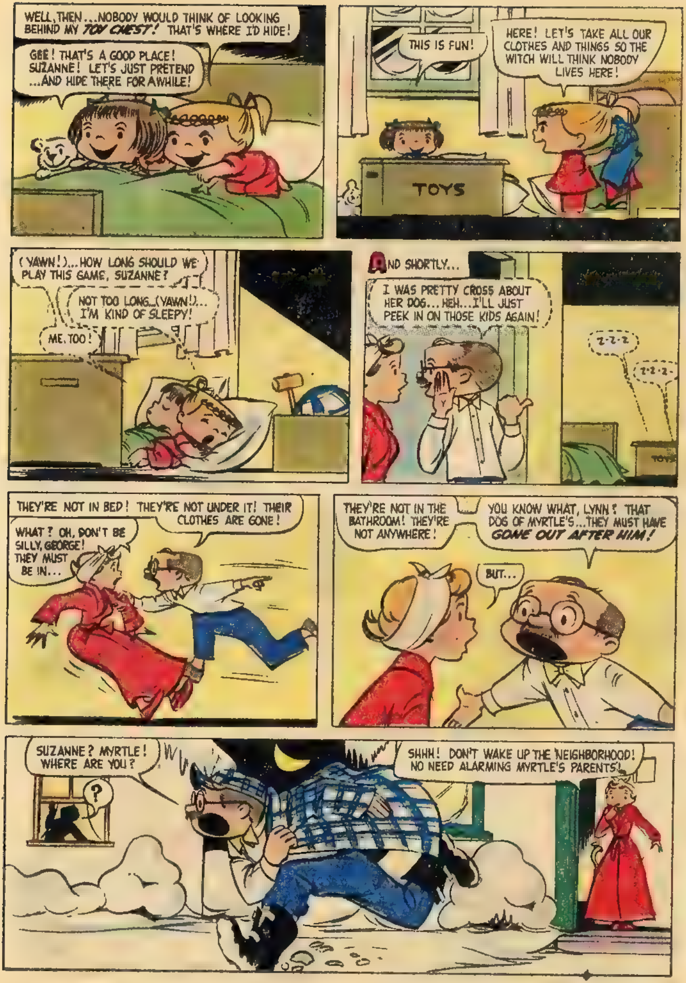

"Well!" said Papacito, suddenly growing several inches taller. "What deed I tell you, Little Pancho?"

"Yes, indeed," the man continued with a wicked smile, "and I am going to put you in my place! Only you can tell the audience how terrible it is to be up so early in the morning!"

While Papacito's face grew pale and his jaw dropped in dismay, Little Pancho Vanilla turned to the announcer with a wink, and grinned. "I theenk, Senor Amigo, that you have taught my Papacito a lesson. Now he knows what they mean when they say eet ees the early bird who gets the worm!"
